In 1984, when seeing TRS for the first time, I thought "The folks who made this obviously saw "Toward the Unknown" and copied some of its style", especially in the scenes where aircraft are shown from above climbing towards the camera with the desert in the background. One reviewer refers to the "fictitious bomber" in the movie.

The poem details the speaker coming to terms with motherhood and her relationship with the newborn baby. The speaker, who we assume to be the mother ('and I stumble from bed, cow-heavy - the image of a clumsy post-birth mother), begins with mixed senses of both wonder and detachment which seems to turn into a positive attitude towards the end of the poem.
